

Synesthesia

Part II

By Ciarán Handley

16th September 2018

Synesthesia

Chapter 1

Synesthesia can be consciously learned as a means to focus Extra-Sensory Perception

“Synesthesia” means the ability to perceive something through a sense that would not normally be associated with perceiving that thing.

Unlike synesthesia as normally defined by psychologists, the synesthesia I have is not involuntary. It is completely under my control. I was not born with it. I developed it as a means to enhance my senses. I have the senses of other people. But to this I add something more. It gives me the ability to perceive more.

This is something I can teach.

In my case I have recoded some Extra-Sensory Perception senses so that they are interpreted also in terms of more “standard” senses, such as hearing or smell. By working in this way I receive the information through Extra-Sensory Perception, but the information now also comes in through more orthodox senses. For example I “hear” engineering, healing, art and economics as a symphonic orchestra. This ability is completely under my conscious control.

The ability to smell danger

Another synesthesia sense I have is the ability to “smell” danger. I have very highly developed precognition and I often get an instinctive warning moments before something happens. I get this as a precognitive sense through ESP. But for the last five and a half years in particular I now also “smell” it.

This has saved my life a number of times. In the event of danger or just before an attack I may suddenly stop what I am doing and “sniff” the air. Before an attack I have often done this. It is synesthesia. The ability to smell danger psychically.

Clouseau v Cato – Round 3

Synesthesia

End of Part II